The US has been involved in several significant conflicts throughout its history, including World War I and II, where it emerged victorious after the development of nuclear bombs. The country's 50 states are each governed by their own capitals, showcasing the diversity and complexity of American society. On July 16, 1790, Washington D.C. was officially designated as the capital of the United States. However, Annapolis is the smallest U.S. capital city and has been serving as the capital of Maryland since its early days. The District of Columbia (D.C.) is a unique entity that isn't a state, as the Constitution requires the seat of government to be located in a district no larger than 10 square miles. Interestingly, some states have multiple cities that have served as their capitals at different times. For example, Philadelphia was removed as the capital of Pennsylvania in 1799 because it was also serving as the nation's capital. In fact, most U.S. state capitals have undergone changes over time. Here are some interesting facts about the state capitals: * Montpelier, Vermont is the smallest capital city by population. * Phoenix, Arizona is the largest capital city by population. * Some states have capitals that are also their largest cities (e.g., Alabama's Montgomery and Alaska's Juneau). * Many states have changed their capitals over time. * The 13 original states have "statehood" dates listed in the table, which indicates when they ratified the U.S. Constitution.
